MAD MONEY

by Eddie Bell

ONE of the boys in stir had tipped off Slick Walden about the Widow Barlow. The stir-bum who had offered the invitation was doing life, so the information would have done him no good. "I was going to go through that house like a vacuum cleaner," he had told Slick, regretfully. "It was my next job. But I got in this fight, and now you see where I am."

Slick had a sense of humor. He said he saw. "And you don't belong here, Brownie," he added. "They can't do that to you."

Brownie shook his head. "You are right, Slick," he returned, dolefully, "they can't."

This Brownie liked to talk. He had a good eye for detail, too. And he told Slick much—the layout of the house, the way it was not patrolled by police, how the old lady lived alone with nothing but a radio and memories to keep her company. "That house of hers is loaded with pictures of her late husband, Grubstake Barlow," Brownie disclosed. "He hit a good vein out in the west years ago. A lot of that dough is still in the house."

"How do you know?"

"The old lady always paid her bills with cash. She didn't trust banks and neither did her husband, from what I could rake up. Seems a bank was held up once and Grubstake's dough was in it. 'Course, he got it back from the bank, but the scare was plenty for him."

Slick had laughed. "It looks like an easy touch. But it seems to me I heard something about people like this Widow Barlow not keeping money in the house. That often happens."

"Not this time, brother. I know where it is!"

"What?" It was difficult to believe.

Slick had writhed while Brownie played his trump card. "I don't mind telling you about this, Slick, and letting you do the job. But you're gonna have to look for the cache, unless you kick back to me. I can spend dough around here, you know." Wistfully, Brownie had added. "There might even be enough to get me a good mouth-piece."

"Never mind that now. I'll kick in, and you know Slick's word is good. Where's the dough?"

Brownie had told him then. How he had been casing the house and struck a friendship with a kid who ran errands for the Widow. He had learned from the kid about the chest in the cellar. "A treasure chest," the boy had said excitedly, "and filled with stacks of money. I know, 'cause I peeked and saw her looking at it." Wide-eyed, he had added: "There were a lot of bonds there, too."

Slick had added. "She probably gets money from bonds. Whew, I'll bet there's plenty."

With dreams of wealth to come in his mind, the days of Slick's sentence passed slowly. He was tortured constantly with the thought that something might happen to the Widow. Brownie had said she was quite old and feeble. What if she died, and some relative inherited the money?

Slick used to wake up, bathed in cold perspiration, from dreams like this.

But at last his time was served. He went into the Warden and listened to the usual lecture. Then he set out for a grubstake to pull the job.

He had friends, and they didn't let him down. It took two weeks to get everything in order, a sunlamp wiped the prison pallor from his face, new clothes made him the old Slick again, and a conservative but powerful black-bodied car put him right on top of the world. And took him to Carton.

Carton was one of those little towns that just seemed to breathe happily always. It was quiet and peaceful, with two white-shingled churches. Elms and maples lined the residential streets, and the Main Street had shops in excellent and simple taste. Slick was very happy to discover the town boasted only a Sheriff.

On the trip down from the city, Slick formulated his plan. He'd case the house for a day or two, then, representing himself as a writer of Western literature, he'd interview the old lady, tell her he wanted to include her late husband, Grubstake, in his book. Once inside, he'd make her talk, or else . . .

He found the house easily enough. It was afternoon, and Slick hid in the thick foliage which surrounded the place, looked over the modest home. He was glad, a moment later, that he had hidden. For the door opened suddenly and a shrill voice cried, "Get out of here, I don't care what you have to . . ."

A man rushed out, holding his hands around his face to ward off the blows being launched at him with a broom. Slick smiled. The old lady was not very tall, but she sure was wiry. And mad.

"That's no place for a salesman to go," he said to himself. "It's a good thing I'm not going to impersonate one."

He hung around a while longer, watched the disgruntled salesman disappear down the road. Then, still chuckling, Slick got into his car and drove twenty-five miles to the nearest city. There, he registered in a hotel, dined, and went to bed. He wanted to be fresh for the morrow's task—and murder, if need be.

For Slick was not squeamish about such things. It lurked behind the bright blue eyes as they looked, next morning into the suspicious face of Widow Barlow.

The old lady snapped: "What do you want? Don't tell me you're after my money, too."

Slick started. The old gal was really balmy, admitting she had money around. Then, he realized she hadn't meant quite that. With a disarming smile, he stated his business.

It worked. "A book writer," the old lady shrilled. "Come in. Come in. I always said Grubstake should have a book written about him." She led the way into a musty library, on the way in, Slick saw that Brownie hadn't been lying. The halls, every room was littered with Western trophies and pictures of the late Grubstake.

"Sit down," said the old lady, indicating an old-fashioned rocker. "I'll get Grubstake's diary. It's in my sewing room." She bustled out, and the minute she did, Slick was up and looking around the room.

There was no door there to the cellar. It would probably be in the kitchen. He'd look, just to make sure. He didn't reckon with the location of the old lady's sewing room. It was next to the kitchen.

She saw him peering down the cellar stairs and immediately became suspicious. Slick saw her, just in time. She was bringing out a shotgun from a closet.

In an instant, his hands were around the frail neck. A slight pressure. She fell to the floor.

He had brought a flashlight with him. The cellar was dingy and dirty. It took Slick five minutes to find the box. It was hidden beneath a section of board floor, which had obviously been laid for the purpose of hiding the fortune.

Feverishly, his fingers worked at the box. He kicked at the rusty lock as his fingers failed to budge it. The lock snapped off, and the next instant Slick was peering at a fortune in currency. He didn't notice in his excitement that the bonds were gone. He could only stare at the neatly stacked bundles of bills, with the color draining fast from his face.

He almost went mad as he saw the fortune in his grasp—that he couldn't touch! For every one of the bills was a yellowback, currency redeemable in gold. But dangerous to have in one's possession, since the nation was off the gold standard. These bills should have been turned in years ago.

With a wild cry, Slick tore at the paper money, scattered it all around. He heard nothing except his own cries of rage. He didn't hear the insistent knocking on the door upstairs, nor the noise when the door was battered in. He just threw money around madly.

That's the way the Sheriff and the men whom Slick had seen the day before found him. He was still raging when they brought him upstairs to confront the old lady. The Sheriff had revived her.

"You shouldn't oughtta throwed this man out of your house, Widder Barlow," the Sheriff chided, indicating the stranger. "He's from the Government."

"A Treasury agent,, Mrs. Barlow," the stranger explained gently. "Your bank asked me to investigate after you cashed in your bonds and made the strange request that the money be paid you in yellowbacks because you didn't want to have anything more to do with green bills. I only wanted to tell you, yesterday, that yellowbacks are illegal to possess and that you'd have to turn them in for other currency. That's why I brought your friend, the Sheriff, back with me today."

The Sheriff grunted, tugged at Slick's shoulder. "Good thing we come when we did, Widder Barlow," he said. "This crook mighta got all your money. From now on, Widder, you're gonna have to put it in a bank."

The old lady didn't answer him. She was looking at Slick and saying: "Did I show you the pictures of Grubstake on the Yukon Trail?"

But all Slick could say was, "Yellowbacks. Yellowbacks!" He was quite mad, too!

NOT TO BE REPEATED!

Remember this about anything that concerns our armed forces or our war production:

If you HEAR it from someone . . . don't repeat it!

If you SEE it yourself . . . don't repeat it!

If you read it in personal letters . . . don't repeat it!

What you privately hear, see, or read may not seem important to you. But Axis agents piece together big military secrets from many little scraps of conversation overheard all over our country.

You may safely repeat only information you read in newspapers and magazines, or hear on the radio.

The life of someone dear to you may be at stake. Think before you talk!
